Harrison Montana was once home to a highly secure government science facility akin to Area 51. However, due to pressure from protests of the Vietnam War, the facility that the locals referred to as, "The Pitch," was closed and abandoned. Over the years, most of what was left of The Pitch's structures were converted to houses and government buildings according to the needs of the growing community including the main building that housed the central offices and labs, which became the new, "Harrison High School."

Jason Knox and his friends attend Harrison High. They are a small, tight-knit group obsessed with all things science. As a team, they have taken home the blue ribbon at the County Science Fair for two years running. Their interest is nurtured and encouraged by their quirky science teacher, MR. POSTAN, a man who loves science as much as he loves to spin tales and conspiracy theories about the subject's sorted past and the strange and unexplainable experiments conducted in secret labs throughout history, especially at The Pitch.

One night, after hearing an intriguing story by Mr. Postan, Knox and his friends decide to slip past LAUDA, the school's creepy old janitor and sneak into Harrison High's condemned basement. In the dark and dusty corridors beneath the building, they encounter an extensive network of tunnels, strange rooms, and laboratories that have been abandoned for decades.

Under a layer of dust, the boys come across the journal of HANS MULLER, a young scientist who worked at the facility long ago. The book is filled with strange drawings, complicated mathematical equations, and notes written in German on napkins and other pieces of paper stuffed between the pages. When the book slips from its binding, Knox and his friends discover that the original cover is embossed with a symbol of the Third Reich.

After an incredibly bright girl named CHELSEA, begins threatening Knox's chance for another blue ribbon at the science fair, he and his friends dive into Muller's journal to find the perfect science project.

What they find instead, chills them to the bone. The mystery behind The Pitch and the laboratories below Harrison High suddenly become personal and terrifying when Knox and his friends discover a photo of themselves, with their rival Chelsea, smiling as they stand in a lab... in Nazi Germany... in 1945.

The photo leads Knox, Chelsea, and their friends on an adventure through time as they race against a dark government agency to uncover the secrets behind a young scientist and a dangerous Nazi experiment that could shatter American History, as we know it.
